Mr. Pitton sent up the jaw bones of this shark to the Admiralty court, at Jamaica, (where they now remain.) with his compliments, observing that he considered them a very proper collar for all neutrals to wear through in future.

But this tall-tale of a shark had not yet done with the poor Americans, who never lost an opportunity of turning an honest penny, by carrying on the trade of their enemies. Capt. Otway was at that period serving in the West-Indies, in the Trent frigate, and happened to be present at this discussion of the affair of the shark. Being about to sail on a cruiser Mr. Waterhouse, the prize agent, desired him if he met with a certain American brig, (which he described,) and could find out the captain's name to be Pearl Darkey, a name he was not likely to forget, to send him in, for, by the same papers, it appeared that he was deeply concerned in these transactions.

The Trent sailed, and among others, fell in with a brig of a description similar to that which Mr. Waterhouse had given; and the moment the master of her stepped on the quarter deck of the frigate, with his papers in hand, Captain Otway, at a venture addressed him, 'Mr. Pearl Darkey, how do you do—I am am glad to see you—the very man I have been looking for.' Jonathan started and turned pale, on hearing his name thus familiarly mentioned, for it was actually Darkey himself, and Capt. Otway added, by way of helping him out of this dilemma, 'I'm in possession of your whole history and connexion—I know every thing about you, and am now going to send you into Port Royal for judgment.' The man, in his dismay and confusion, naturally concluded that their schemes had been betrayed by some who were in the secret, and did not even attempt to defend himself under his fictitious character. The ruse of confidently addressing him at once as Pearl Darkey, threw him off his guard, and deprived him of every subtlety. She was accordingly sent in and condemned a good prize to the Trent, after the fullest proof of her being loaded with the property of the enemy. In the whole of these transactions this American bark was a solitary, but very convincing evidence.

Cotton Seed Oil—Two French Chemists, Wellard and Bailey, have discovered that the seed of the American cotton tree contains much good oil, and that, after several experiments they obtained six litres (pints) of oil from fifteen kilograms (thirty lbs.) of the grain.
